Dillon Launches Development Consulting Firm

Greg Dillon, who helped guide and develop FedEx Field on behalf of the late Jack Kent Cooke, is now the principal and founder of Dillon Development Partners, an advisory firm offering land development services.

In his new business, Dillon is helping his clients secure financing, implement models for optimum land use, and bring teams together for constructing and managing development projects.

A cost-benefit approach and rigorous cost controls are important elements offered by Dillon, who earlier in his career was a tax consultant and auditor with Price Waterhouse

As an advisory land development company, Dillon offers a range of land development services on behalf of individuals, corporations and organizations seeking optimum value from their holdings.

His potential clients are real estate developers, nonprofit organizations, government agencies, investors, banking trust departments, private institutions and corporations with site selection and expansion needs.

Dillon, a lifetime director of the Jack Kent Cooke Foundation, has been actively involved in the former Redskins owners' endowments, which have been used recently to award scholarships.
